Two Views Of It

Michigan State University sent two of its bright young men from campus to the Upper Peninsula recently to conduct a Forest Economics Workshop in Escanaba.

It drew a good sized attendance of foresters and wood industry people, who expected it to provide them with the current view of intellectuals and economists on their area problems and opportunities.

They were somewhat disappointed, we judge, by the workshop. It was longer on economic philosophy than one specifics of the U. P.'s woods industry. Industrial foresters said that they are working with later data from the Lake States Forest Inventory than those used in the workshop. They cited that Michigan Tech's School of Forestry has been able to standardize IBM (International Business Machines computer) processing of continuing forest inventory data. bridging a troublesome gap in technology. The industries do the field work and Tech finishes the informational process.

This was cited as an example of a university helping an industry in a very practical and applicable way with the organization of new knowledge for commercial benefit.

A thesis of Dr. Robert J. Marty, associate professor of forestry at MSU, was that private industry and government agencies approach decision making about management of our Upper Peninsula commercial forests in different man-

Industry, obviously, tries to make a profit. Government needn't make a profit, but it tries for income as an indication of its good management, and it trumpets with pride that it is creating many public benefits like hunting and fishing, campgrounds, picnic sites, beaches, woodland trails, snowmobile courses, etc., in the process of growing timber to supply industry.

Industry, on its part, isn't as effective in vocalizing about the side benefits that it is creating for the public, but it makes a tremendous contribution to the public in the U. P. with its forest policies. Its forests not only supply wood that makes jobs and taxes, but they also are open to the public for all kinds of recreation. Industry pleads these public benefits in asking partial tax deferral on growing timber under the Forest Reserve Act, but these benefits are not really well anchored in the public knowledge.

Dr. Marty, we think, is right on the button when he says that neither the private nor public sectors presently tote up the end results of their forest policies because the process is very difficult and we're not good at it yet. Business tries to make a buck. Government tries to expand and control and serve public interest.

Most observers, we think, now regard them both as very useful to our society and our econis the money maker. Government omy. Industry is the rehabilitation agency, because it can be supported with taxes and needn't make a profit to survive. The Forest Service notes that it is now reclaiming lands in Illinois, Indiana and Ohio ruined by strip coal mining and creating forests on them. It expects eventually that there'll be pressure to return those forests to the commercial economy.

Obviously, however, industry is much more enlightened and conservation conscious than it was a generation ago. And it shouldn't be forgotten that government got some of its forest lands through government policies of taxation which made private ownership impossible.

Dr. Marty puts forward here a thought that is of great importance.

The public comes finally to a fudgment on major policies. It has supported an increasing amount of socialization as inevitable in an urbanized industrial society. It should be informed on the complementary roles of forest industry and government forestry so that it can insist upon the continuance of both. All the public benefits and costs of their operations should be audited for this purpose, infers Dr. Marty. We agree.

BERRY'S WORLD

Religion Is More Than A Habit

By DAVID POLING

For many caring people in the ranks of Christian leadership, to serve God has been to leave the sacred quadrangle, the cloister, the cathedral setting and be part of the secular scene. Across the world this is happening. Some stay in uniform. Others are willing to use the disguise and fashion of the world to secure their witness to Him who made life and calls us to creatively express

No more vivid illustration of this plunge into the secular world could be found than in the person of Sister Jacqueline Grennan, president of Webster College outside of St. Louis, Mo.

After a lengthy soul-sorting period, she announced that she wished to be relieved from her vows as a member of the order of the Sisters of Loretta. In her statement to the press, she said: I have struggled to understand whether the vow of obedience limits one's ability to commit oneself to responsibilities which are largely outside the domain of the heirarchal church I have come to believe that the notion of the cloister—in physical enclosure or in social regulations or in dress-is not valid for some of us who must live our lives as dedicated women in the public forum.

Her involvement in the pushing and shoving of life went far beyond the expected agenda for a nun who was president of a church college. She has been a vital contributor in leadership to the Peace Corps, to urban slum projects and on the front line of educational experiments with other universities and foundations. The theater that she established with the support of Conrad Hilton on the Webster campus hardly restricted itself to the themes from the "Singing Nuns" or isolated acts from morality plays of the Middle

What will her strategy be, how does she define her new position? In one statement she remarked:

Whenever you expend your energy defending positionsas the church did for so long -you lose the spirit of free inquiry. Now the whole concept of the church is changing and it will never be the same—thank the Lord.

Then she touched on the meaning of her witness, both in academic communities and on the sidewalks of St. Louis:

Convinced of the power of religious presence as distinct from religious control, we wish to demonstrate to an open and opening world, and to ourselves that the vital force of faith can live and mature in dynamic society.

Out of all the flurry and, at times, fury of the present religious dishevelment we will see the emergence of new men and women of faith. Not fearful or hesitant or cringing, but faithful ones who have the nerve to believe that this is God's world. That, with Teilard de Chardin, "we go to meet him who comes." That the One who is the God and Father of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob is also part of the present moment and will be there in the next. And not restricted to the secure surroundings, the predictable Gothic patterns of the past.

Philadelphia Leads In Racial Solutions

By BRUCE BIOSSAT

WASHINGTON (NEA) -Cracks of hopeful daylight can be found here and there in a troubled urban racial situation which many observers of the nation's black community insist on painting in hopelessly gloomy tones.

These small bits of optimism appear at a fortuitous moment, for investigative disclosures of fraud and inefficiency in the massive New York City poverty-welfare complex are seen as having struck a hard blow against such programs-despite the argument that they ease tensions in the seething whetto communities

Fortunately for the nation, through all the tumult and the shouting from black militants on the one hand and rightist whites who would repress the blacks on the other, a hardy band of both whites and blacks keeps hacking away pragmatically at real problems and helping to produce at least partial answers.

Typical of this band is Andrew Freeman of Philadelphia's Urban League, a softspoken but highly determined man who for years has been fighting for practical gains for the black community and getting some of them, while his more militant breathren have been shouting for the millennium tomorrow and achieving virtually nothing.

Measured on the scale of practical advances, Freeman saw 1968 in Philadelphia as a year of more promise than a quick tour of the black ghetto might suggest. And he says he is "very optimistic" that 1969 will be a good deal better.

In the employment field, it may shake some of those who believe that federally sponsored programs are inevitably doomed to failure to hear that on-the-job training efforts under U. S. Department of Labor guidance have been the most successful in Philadelphia.

Figures for 1968 are not yet complete, but may well exceed 1967. Nearly 3,000 blacks trained under this program were at work-and the socalled "job retention" rate ranged impressively between 85 to 98 per cent.

Most disappointing in 1968 was the failure to arouse a proper sense of urgency among the potential employers of the black trainees. The phenomenon is curious, since several years ago this reporter, examining the Philadelphia economic scene, found hopeful stirrings among many top indus-

Another extremely difficult problem is the often crushing indifference of hard core unemployed blacks to the job appeals made. The discipline of regular work is painfully foreign to men with a long history of idleness and its freedom-empty though that may

Nevertheless, men like Freeman never give up fighting for the small victories on the job, school and housing fronts which, when pieced together over the years, mark real advances.

Notwithstanding earlier discouragements, he is confident more business employers are going to get the message in 1969 and hire black trainees or help train them as they work. The National Alliance of Businessmen has made job pledges which may be fulfilled better this year than last. The Urban Coalition, not too productive in Philadelphia so far, is still eyed hopefully.

Pragmatic black leaders are impressed by Mark Shedd, city school superintendent, whom they put down as a concerned man. This does not mean the city has made huge strides toward solving its racial school problems. As in other urban centers, tensions erupt in violence from time to time: busing is protested by irate whites and integration on a big scale is still heavily opposed by

The school system needs more money, more community support. It is still judged poor overall, and worse rather than better in black sectors. Yet a note of hope is being struck.

Even housing prospects look more promising. A 1968 U.S. law providing subsidies that will allow one per cent mortgage charges for low-income buyers opens up a market for blighted but basically sound dwellings which can be reconditioned. Poor blacks may be buying.

Two Views Of It

Michigan State University sent two of its bright young men from campus to the Upper Peninsula recently to conduct a Forest Economics Workshop in Escanaba.

It drew a good sized attendance of foresters and wood industry people, who expected it to provide them with the current view of intellectuals and economists on their area problems and opportunities.

They were somewhat disappointed, we judge, by the workshop. It was longer on economic philosophy than one specifics of the U. P.'s woods industry. Industrial foresters said that they are working with later data from the Lake States Forest Inventory than those used in the workshop. They cited that Michigan Tech's School of Forestry has been able to standardize IBM (International Business Machines computer) processing of continuing forest inventory data. bridging a troublesome gap in technology. The industries do the field work and Tech finishes the informational process.

This was cited as an example of a university helping an industry in a very practical and applicable way with the organization of new knowledge for commercial benefit.

A thesis of Dr. Robert J. Marty, associate professor of forestry at MSU, was that private industry and government agencies approach decision making about management of our Upper Peninsula commercial forests in different man-

Industry, obviously, tries to make a profit. Government needn't make a profit, but it tries for income as an indication of its good management, and it trumpets with pride that it is creating many public benefits like hunting and fishing, campgrounds, picnic sites, beaches, woodland trails, snowmobile courses, etc., in the process of growing timber to supply industry.

Industry, on its part, isn't as effective in vocalizing about the side benefits that it is creating for the public, but it makes a tremendous contribution to the public in the U. P. with its forest policies. Its forests not only supply wood that makes jobs and taxes, but they also are open to the public for all kinds of recreation. Industry pleads these public benefits in asking partial tax deferral on growing timber under the Forest Reserve Act, but these benefits are not really well anchored in the public knowledge.

Dr. Marty, we think, is right on the button when he says that neither the private nor public sectors presently tote up the end results of their forest policies because the process is very difficult and we're not good at it yet. Business tries to make a buck. Government tries to expand and control and serve public interest.

Most observers, we think, now regard them both as very useful to our society and our economy. Industry is the money maker. Government is the rehabilitation agency, because it can be supported with taxes and needn't make a profit to survive. The Forest Service notes that it is now reclaiming lands in Illinois, Indiana and Ohio ruined by strip coal mining and creating forests on them. It expects eventually that there'll be pressure to return those forests to the commercial economy.

Obviously, however, industry is much more enlightened and conservation conscious than it was a generation ago. And it shouldn't be forgotten that government got some of its forest lands through government policies of taxation which made private ownership impossible.

Dr. Marty puts forward here a thought that is of great importance.

The public comes finally to a judgment on major policies. It has supported an increasing amount of socialization as inevitable in an urbanized industrial society.

It should be informed on the complementary roles of forest industry and government forestry so that it can insist upon the continuance of both. All the public benefits and costs of their operations should be audited for this purpose, infers Dr. Marty. We agree.

Religion Is More Than A Habit

By DAVID POLING

For many caring people in the ranks of Christian leadership, to serve God has been to leave the sacred quadrangle. the cloister, the cathedral setting and be part of the secular scene. Across the world this is happening. Some stay in uniform. Others are willing to use the disguise and fashion of the world to secure their witness to Him who made life and calls us to creatively express

No more vivid illustration of this plunge into the secular world could be found than in the person of Sister Jacqueline Grennan, president of Webster College outside of St. Louis, Mo.

After a lengthy soul-sorting period, she announced that she wished to be relieved from her vows as a member of the order of the Sisters of Loretta. In her statement to the press,

I have struggled to understand whether the vow of obedience limits one's ability to commit oneself to responsibilities which are largely outside the domain of the heirarchal church. I have come to believe that the notion of the cloister-in physical enclosure or in social regulations or in dress-is not valid for some of us who must live our lives as dedicated women in the public forum.

Her involvement in the pushing and shoving of life went far beyond the expected agenda for a nun who was president of a church college. She has been a vital contributor in leadership to the Peace Corps. to urban slum projects and on the front line of educational experiments with other universities and foundations. The theater that she established with the support of Conrad Hilton on the Webster campus hardly restricted itself to the themes from the "Singing Nuns" or isolated acts from morality plays of the Middle

What will her strategy be, how does she define her new position? In one statement she remarked:

Whenever you expend your energy defending positionsas the church did for so long -you lose the spirit of free inquiry. Now the whole concept of the church is changing and it will never be the same—thank the Lord.

Then she touched on the meaning of her witness, both in academic communities and on the sidewalks of St. Louis:

Convinced of the power of religious presence as distinct from religious control, we wish to demonstrate to an open and opening world, and to ourselves that the vital force of faith can live and mature in a dynamic society

Out of all the flurry and, at times, fury of the present religious dishevelment we will see the emergence of new men and women of faith. Not fearful or hesitant or cringing, but faithful ones who have the nerve to believe that this is God's world. That, with Teilard de Chardin, "we go to meet him who comes."
